Laissez-Faire Economics: The Politics of Addiction Gail Kozlinski

A corrupt institution has materialized through the world, affecting everyone's daily life. Currently, the toll of drug trafficking can be seen in the drug war the U.S. and Mexican governments are waging against drug cartels in their respective territories. The illicit industry of drug trafficking has become so prevalent in the world that it carries a huge impact on the world. Drug trafficking has become such a widespread issue that it now inflicts various countries from a political, economic, and socio-cultural viewpoint. Seeing as many futile efforts to control this institution have taken place, drug trafficking has spread like wildfire to nearly every corner of the world. In fact, new routes of trade are developing in places that lack the enforcement, and the infrastructure that is needed to detect the possibility of trafficking. Given the new state of the world economy, a dramatic increase in trafficking is seen and is proven to have occurred. For example, in Afghanistan the opium production has increased a remarkable 15 times since 1979. More than seventy-five percent of the heroin being sold and sent to Europe (and one hundred percent of the heroin sold in Russia) originates from Afghanistan. Across the globe it is countries like Columbia, Peru, and Bolivia that produce about one thousand tons of cocaine annually. The mass production of this drug begins to send a negative impulse through South America's entirety. This Latin American cocaine is shipped to an estimated ten million users in the United States, as well as Europe, via other Latin American countries. These few, yet dominant, drug producing countries have a negative backlash that affect the world as a whole.
